Dial M for movies

Stewart, Alan

Communications International v21n8 PP: 54-58 Aug 1994 ISSN: 0305-2109

JRNL CODE: COI

WORD COUNT: 2648

ABSTRACT: Major telcos are investing billions of dollars in video-on-demand (VOD). Their success at entering the entertainment business will depend on the quality of the technology supporting the nascent VOD industry. All VOD systems need one essential piece of equipment - the video server. This device enables subscribers electronically to order up movies and other programs and receive them over the network within a few minutes. In a VOD network, a video server is located at some central point where it can be accessed by both the program provider and the program recipient. The term video-dial-tone (VDT) refers to the provision of VOD and access to other information services via a common user interface. VDT is implemented across 3 main environments: 1. the subscriber premises, 2. one or more Level 1 gateways, and 3. one or more Level 2 gateways. The current political and regulatory climates in the US augur well for the creation of a dynamic VOD industry involving both the traditional cable TV companies and the telephone local exchange companies there.

TEXT:

DT Productions has signed a new licensing agreement to deliver digital music video content to the Sound Leisure range of juke boxes and foreground systems in over 1,000 venues in the UK.

The new deal builds on the successful launch of the Video Surfer which was the first digital video juke box released in the UK.

Sound Leisure's owner Alan Black commented "This new deal aims to build on three successful years of manufacturing digital juke boxes and the release this year of foreground video systems, new juke box models and our expansion into Europe. DT Productions has been providing the video content to the juke box estate and it was the right deal ahead of the new product launches."

Survey of Business Air Travel (10): Airlines race to equip their fleets -
Paul Taylor examines developments in airborne entertainment systems
(Passenger seat is focus for new digital revolution)

Financial Times London Edition, p IV

April 20, 1995

DOCUMENT TYPE: Business Newspaper ISSN: 0307-1766 (United Kingdom)

LANGUAGE: English RECORD TYPE: Fulltext

WORD COUNT: 1364

ABSTRACT:

The passenger seat is the focus for a new digital revolution which is bringing sophisticated interactive multimedia entertainment systems, information services and telecommunications links to travellers on the world's leading airlines. The world's airlines are racing to equip their long distance fleets with individual seat-back screens and the interactive systems developed by a handful of equipment vendors. Among the airlines Virgin Atlantic already has an interactive entertainment systems in operation while American Airlines, British Airways, Singapore Airlines and United Airlines are among the carriers which have announced plans to phase in systems on long-haul routes this year. From the passengers' point of view these new systems promise to deliver - usually for an additional fee - an unparalleled choice of amusements ranging from video-on-demand films and CD quality music to computer games and gambling. In addition, most will also provide passengers with the ability to book car hire or hotel rooms and order merchandise from their aircraft seats and view financial data and other real-time information services. Those travelling with portable computers will also be able to send or receive electronic mail, log onto the Internet and send or receive or facsimile messages using satellite or ground-based telecommunications networks - in addition to making ordinary voice telephone calls.

Communications subsidiary. Some analysts estimate that interactive entertainment systems could earn the airlines Dollars 1m or more per aircraft each year and that if plans for in-flight gambling are approved, this figure could double. This is an extensive article that contains many details of the services that will be available.

ABSTRACT: The emergence of video as a major force in the music industry in the latter part of the 20th century was preceded by earlier attempts to combine the two media in the 1940s via visual music using a 'video jukebox' known as Param Soundie. This and other machines of its type persisted in the market until the late 1960s. The concept of MTV or music television took firm root to a television-addicted generation in the 1980s. The 1990s has witnessed the technological advances in multimedia systems which may point the way to more innovative integration of video and music.

The debate about the Internet eating into the share of traditional media is actually a non-starter. Nowhere is it more evident than in the case of television companies which are leveraging the power, potential and reach of the Net to rub off on their presence in the black box. And its a two-way street, with the Net providing a storehouse of info and archival matter on a particular story. So, no prizes for guessing who ends up getting the larger piece of the cake? The customer, my dear.

Lets take a look at some of the TV channel web sites to see media convergence tools in action. Punch in www.cnn.com and what do we have here? The top menu bar on the beautifully- designed site of CNN has audio and video links and the main menu on the left has a section on multimedia with links to video,

DT Productions has signed a new licensing agreement to deliver digital music video content to the Sound Leisure range of juke boxes and foreground systems in over 1,000 venues in the UK.

The new deal builds on the successful launch of the Video Surfer which was the first digital video juke box released in the UK.

Sound Leisure 's owner Alan Black commented "This new deal aims to build on three successful years of manufacturing digital juke boxes and the release this year of foreground video systems, new juke box models and our expansion into Europe. DT Productions has been providing the video content to the juke box estate and it was the right deal ahead of the new product launches."
